that plans have been prepared by the Central Secretariat of the SED for a reorganization of agriculture in the Soviet zone. In public it is denied that any changes are meditated; thus Paul Merker wrote in Neues Deutschland on 14 August 1948: "The SED does not plan to carry out a second land reform which would divide the property of the large farmers, as is alleged for obvious reasons. It regards the land reform as completed, and rejects interference with the property and ownership status of the peasants, big and little."

Nevertheless, [redacted] preparations have been made to reduce the limit for expropriation of farm land from 100 to 50 hectares. Propaganda against the owners of large farms has already started. They are accused of controlling the Vereinigung der gegenseitigen Bauernhilfe (VdGB) in the villages, and of exploiting this control to the detriment of the "new farmers". Further, they are reproached as "exploiting" (in contrast to "laboring") farmers, because they employ farm laborers. These arguments were stressed by Walter Ulbricht at the Vorstand meeting on 15 September.

that the purpose is not merely to change the composition of the managing committees of local VdgB groups, but rather, he says, to eliminate the large farmers and then to "collectivize" the villages. It is asserted that this process will begin with the establishment of a few "model kolkhozes" which will be advertised through a vigorous propaganda campaign. Gatherings of farmers will then adopt unanimous resolutions in favor of collectivization of all farm land, and the state governments or the occupying power will announce that they must accede to an overwhelming public demand. this procedure "the path of voluntary compulsion".

4. It is pointed out that although 3,203,461 hectares of land were expropriated in 1945, only 2,143,727 hectares were distributed to the landless peasants. The remainder has become the property of the states and communities. Agricultural machinery and rural industries were not distributed, but were turned over to the VdgB, which now

5. The land expropriated under the "land reform" included 1,972,812 hectares of arable land and pasture and 991,307 hectares of forest. It has now been proposed in a resolution adopted on 24 September 1948 by the Forest Conference of the German Agricultural Society, meeting at Oberhof in Thuringia, that all peasants who possess woodland be organized into "VdgB Forest Associations", in order to facilitate the joint management of the forests and make them more profitable. [REDACTED] these associations would be analogous to the collective farms of the Soviet Union.
